

Addressing OSEU One with Cheryl Medearis

I really believe that the Wolakota Project has reinvigorated that piece. I think it is something that we use very strongly. I've shared that with not only our teacher education candidates, but also with our science and math and social studies instructors across the institution. We have a rich, beautiful land base, and very little in traditional education talks about that.

So the stories, the respect for the land, the respect for giving back to the land and being good stewards of that land is something that I have tried very hard in my position to share, because it's something I carry in my heart, you know, being raised in South Dakota and to help our young children see how important it is to take care of that land.
